NEWS FOR VETERANS

No name is unusual in the 30,000,000 names carried in the central file of Veterans Administration. Even the most unique are duplicated some of them many times over.

So, says VA, when you write to the agency about your benefit claim or your GI insurance policy, be sure to give your benefit claim ("C") number or the number of your policy, whichever applies.

While there may be many names like yours in VA's files, your "C" or your GI insurance policy number is yours and yours alone, VA said.

VA made the plea in an attempt to cut down on "mystery mail" which is costly and time-consuming to handle.

VA said "mystery mail" makes up 10 per cent of all letters received by the agency. Not only is such mail costly to handle, VA says, but it also means the writer will not receive a prompt reply.

Pay Envelopes Short

Chicago.- The pay envelopes of American's workers were short $1,100,000,000 last year.

This wage loss was the result of time lost because of work accidents, the National Safety Council says.

Cost of work accidents rose about 8 per cent last year, according to "Accident Facts," statistical yearbook of the Council.

The booklet shows that medical expenses increased to about $400,000,000 and overhead costs of insurance went up to $450,000,000.

Damaged equipment and materials, production delays, and time losses of other workers not involved in the accidents cost industry $1,800,000,000.

Total cost of work accidents was $3,750,000,000.

DISEASES OF GLADIOLI CAN BE CONTROLLED

Fusarium yellows and corm rot are the most serious diseases of gladioli in Virginia—but they can be controlled.

S. B. Fenne, plant pathologist at VPI, says to discard all visibly affected corms. Use a four-year rotation. Treat all corms with full-strength Arasan.

Use all that will cling to the husked corms. Apply by shaking dust and corms together in a closed container.

To control scab, discard all badly affected corms. Use a four-year rotation. Soak corms 2 hours in bichloride of mercury (one ounce to 7 gallons of water) or soak 7 hours in semesan solution (4 ounces per gallon of water).

Gen. Longstreet after Appoma

By Calvin Robinson

Editor's note: Many read this newspaper because they love The Appomattox Story and expect to find in our columns from time to time articles concerning the War Between the States and its ending here April 9, 1865. This is the second in a new series of such articles.

To plan the grand strategy of a major war, a Jackson, Lee or a Grant were peerless. But when the chips were down and it became a matter of "battle leadership," and the rough and tumble of quick decisions on tactics, James Longstreet must be ranked as one of the greatest in history.

Just as James Longstreet must be ranked as one of the controversial military men of history.

Not having faced Jackson, Grant thought Longstreet was Lee's best general. Anyway, Longstreet was a tremendous fighting general, and the best corps commander, North or South.

The purpose of this brief essay is not to touch the full span of Longstreet's life, but to recount one small chapter of it. But, even in that, I should mention that he was born January 8, 1821, and died on January 2, 1904. In the 83 years between, he tasted all the sweet and all the bitter of life: a great personality in a tumultous century. The family had come over from the Netherlands. In 1657, Dirck Stoffels Longstreet arrived in what is now New York. The generations passed, and the family moved South, and our subject was the fifth child and was born in Edgefield, South Carolina. Through his grandfather, Marshall Dent, Longstreet was related to John Marshall of Virginia, and he was even, very distantly, related to Gen. U. S. Grant.

Skipping the pages of further introduction, be it said that Longstreet was with the Confederacy all the way, from Manassas to Appomattox. In a future article, if this series continues, we may discuss his war career, especially his presence at Appomattox in the final hours of combat.

This essay concerns the days immediately after April 9, 1865. It appears that on the night of April 8, Longstreet had dispatched two horses to Lynchburg to be at his service. This was perfectly proper, for officers depended upon fresh mounts and aimed to have them available along proposed routes of march. On April 12, after the laying down of arms at Old Appomattox Court House, Longstreet called upon his young Texas aide, Captain T. J. Goree, to accompany him to Lynchburg. The general's family was supposed to be awaiting him in the Hill City. They passed that night in Rustburg, and the next day rode into Lynchburg. The horses were not to be found, having been sent southward by one of Longstreet's soldiers. About a month later, they were located in forth Georgia. But the general did rejoin his wife in Lynchburg. She was expecting the birth of another child, and after the fall of Richmond had come to Lynchburg with her son, Garland, then 16. About the middle of May, Longstreet became restless and decided to go to Washington to seek a full pardon. He was persuaded not to do so, and on June 1, 1865, a son was born and given the name James Longstreet, Jr. This was the second son given that name, the first having died in Richmond in 1862.

Texans are proud of their state, and so Captain Goree, mentioned above, sold the general on the idea of going to the Lone Star State to begin a postwar life. The general accepted this concept and planned to leave his wife and family in Lynchburg while he went ahead to set up a new career.

On June 26, 1865, Longstreet parted with his family in Lynchburg, and went to Campbell Court House. Two days later he set out for New Orleans. With him were his son, Garland, Captain Goree, and a Negro servant, Jim. The general and Jim rode in a mule-drawn ambulance, the others on horseback.

The first day the party covered thirty miles, pretty good for that time. The third day they crossed into North Carolina.

The journey ended eventually in New Orleans, and there Longstereet met up with old friends and fellow Civil War officers. He was persuaded to engage in a business enterprise there. From then on, his career became, once again, controversial. We don't care to enter into that discussion now. But I do believe the interest in this fabulous character is such that it would be interesting to know just where he stayed in the City of Lynchburg just after the Surrender, and perhaps there are readers who can add documentation to this one chapter in the life of a great general.

GOOD HEALTH TO ALL FROM REXALL

Health and Beauty

Strain, tension and fatigue affect different people different ways. Some have indigestion as a result; some irritation of the bladder; some leg ache; some back ache; and others head ache. Many more are hit at the back of the neck.

It is best to know how you are affected. This knowledge of your physical self will save you a lot of trouble and worry. It may well add years to your life. Many people are in poor health during middle life live to a vital old age by adopting a daily routine especially suited to them.

Even though you may have general good health, there are probably several little things about your physical individuality that you would be wise to remember. There are many people with good digestion as a rule, but who know that certain foods will disagree with them. Most people find it almost impossible to digest food eaten in an atmosphere of unhappiness and friction.

You have probably found that if you are in the hot sun for a long time you will develop a headache. It may be that you do not react well to a cold shower, that you get sinus trouble if you swim in fresh water or any number of other things.

It is a wise person who heeds these physical eccentricities. You will be adding comfort to your life and may actually be adding to your life span.

If strain and fatigue hit you at the back of the neck, you will find heat and massage helpful. You must learn to relax. These same steps have been known to cure a headache.

Try not to worry about the things in life you can do nothing about. This may sound easy, but it is an art and even the wisest of men have found it impossible.
